TAKASHIMA, YONEKI, of Kahului, Maui, a retired blasting worker with the Kahului Railroad, died Monday at the age of 105. A son, Russell S. Takashima of Kahului, said his father didn't smoke or drink and preferred fish to meat. That may have helped to keep him in good health virtually all of his life, he said. "He was hard of hearing, from when he was a powderman, so he didn't hear anything bad," Russell added. Takashima was born in Kumamoto, Japan, and came to Maui in 1906 to work on the railroad. He suffered some health problems as a blasting worker and was already retired by 1943 when his son joined the Army in World War II. But he remained mentally alert, enjoyed playing Go, a Japanese board game like chess, and was an avid reader up to a few days before he died, Russell said. Takashima is survived by two sons, Tony and Russell of Kahului; a son-in-law, Sadao Taketa; daughters Vivian Watanabe of Kahului and Mrs. James (Toshiko) Ogasawara of Mililani; 12 grandchildren; 16 great-grandchildren. TAMURA, KATSUICHI, president of Waianae's Tamura Superette and dean of Waianae's tennis courts, died last Sunday at Kuakini Medical Center. He was 87. Tamura, eldest of six sons, never had more than a fifth-grade education but built Tamura Superette – originally a plantation store founded by his father in 1905 into a thriving business. Tamura ascribed his success to “a lot of luck.” Those who knew him said it looked more like a lot of work. Tamura, a lifelong tennis buff, began playing in his early teens at what was then Waianae's only tennis court – a cracked blacktop at the Day Care Center on Old Plantation Road. When he was 18, he broke his leg playing tennis. It never healed properly because he continued playing against advice from his doctor. Despite the bum leg, Tamura, using a unique grip on his racket that he taught himself, continued to punish his opponents for decades. Kindly off-court, he took delight in showing no mercy on it. “Yeah, I'm fast at the net,” he said at age 78, when he was losing only six out of 30 sets. “I let my partner run around in back court.” Tamura was also a philanthropist. He spurred hundreds of Waianae kids to take up tennis, sponsored tour tournaments, and handed out soft drinks and gave away cans of tennis balls and rackets to promising young players. Every year he donated 30 turkeys as prizes for Waianae's traditional Thanksgiving tennis tournament. For years Waianae had only two tennis courts, both in Pililau Park. Because of persistent lobbying by Tamura, the city built tennis courts equipped with night lights in the Park and named it Katsuichi Tamura Tennis Center. “I feel like when I donate I get a lot,” Tamura once said. “And if I treat people well, they come back to me. That's it, yeah. Treat the people good. That is God's work.” Tamura was a member of the Wahiawa Soto Mission, Waianae Hongwanji Kyodan, Waianae Doshi Kai, Waianae Tamura Tennis Club, Haleiwa Shingon Shu, and Haleiwa Jodo Shu. Survived by wife, Tsuruko; sons, Clifford K. and Herbert T.; daughter, Mrs. George M. (Annie T.)
