In Sep. 28, 1959, letter to George Chaplin, the Advertiser's then editor-in-chief, Buchanan said he had decided he was cut out to be a newspaperman after trying other forms of mass media. Advertising and pamphleteering were child's play, he wrote and gave him a guilty conscience. "It may sound corny but I suppose I'll always be in the newspapers as long as the back of my neck tingles when I go into the press room," he wrote. Advertiser editor, Gerry Keir said, "the people who work at the copydesk of a newspaper are its unsung heroes. They have the job of writing headlines and being the last checkers for errors in grammar and fact. Writers usually don't give copy editors credit for the good they do." "Tom functioned as the Advertiser's slot-man, the one who checked and polished the work of the other copy editors. It's a high pressure job on deadline every night, but one he handled for years with grace and ease." "He had a love of language and a puckish wit that helped lighten the mood when pressure was on.
