Roland W. Force, who revitalized and changed the course of Bishop Museum as its director from 1962 to 1976, died May 19, 1966 at Queen's hospital. He was 71. His health was fragile because of diabetes and he recently had the flu, said his wife, Maryanne Tefft Force. Under Force's leadership, Bishop Museum expanded "from a significant museum of Hawaii and of the Pacific to an internationally known museum," Frank Radovsky said from Corvallis, Ore., where he has retired and is doing research. "More than anything, what held the museum together (under Force) and allowed it to expand and achieve things in areas of research and exhibits, was the possibility of getting grants," said Radovsky, acting museum director after Force left and assistant director to his successor, Edward Creutz. Force was constantly looking for ways to increase revenues and staff salaries, Radovsky said, noting Force's annual salary when he left the museum was only $25,000. Among Force's recruits was John Wright, museum historian from 1966 to 1982. "We lived through difficult financial times that were not of his making, but because of him we had extraordinary high morale," Wright said. "He had confidence in his staff; he respected the staff. He was a good leader and a wonderful person to work with. We all became good friends, and that doesn't always happen." Force expanded museum research and community services, improved storage of the priceless collections, added the first research building since 1925 and brightened what he called the museum's "dead circus" image. His goal was to create a world-renowned scientific institution and a "people's museum" for residents. He was responsible for a major turning point in museum's history—breaking ties with the Bishop Estate trustees. The museum received no estate money but the trustees dominated the museum board for nearly 80 years. Force sought to cut the link, established in Charles R. Bishop's deed of trust, and incorporate the museum as a charitable trust like most other museums. He argued that the Bishop Museum should receive state funding because it was the state's official repository and provided extensive community services. In keeping with his philosophy that museums should be dynamic, he said he wanted to do things no other museum had done, and he did. Some worked; some didn't. He started a science center and arts and crafts program; undertook restoration of the Falls of Clyde for a maritime museum; created the Heritage Theatre in Waikiki; and brought double-decker London buses here to take visitors from the museum and planetarium in Kalihi, to the Waikiki and waterfront attractions. He left the museum after tripling the programs, staff and budget, saying "a lot of it has been with bailing wire and chewing gum" because of lack of financial support. Force and his wife, an anthropologist who worked with him on scientific expeditions, were first here in 1954. He joined the museum staff and they went to the Palau Islands in Micronesia for a 16-months study. His primary research interests were in the Pacific but he also studied and wrote about North American Indian archaeology. Force was born in Omaha, Neb., and received a doctorate in anthropology in 1958 from Stanford University. He served in the 89th Infantry, European Theater, during World War II. After leaving the Bishop Museum, he was appointed director emeritus and holder of The Charles Reed Bishop Distinguished Chair in Pacific Studies, named for the museum's founder. In 1977, he was appointed director and later became president of the Museum of the American Indian-Heys Foundation of New York City. In 1990, largely through Force's efforts and after a long political fight, the Museum of the American Indian became the National Museum of the American Indian—part of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C. He retired in 1990 and the Forces returned to Honolulu. Survivors, besides his wife, include his father, Richard E. Force of Tehachapi, Calif. A memorial will be held at 4 p.m. Thursday in the Bishop Museum courtyard. [SB 28/05/1996]
