Philip D. Hooton, 83, of Hawi, Hawaii, widely known as a master carver whose images carved in bone, ivory and wood are world-class collectibles, died Jan. 28, 1997 in Hillhaven Kona Health Center in Keauhou, Hawaii.

He was a retired land manager for the former Kohala Sugar Plantation. Hooton drew inspiration for his carvings from early Hawaiian culture. He did meticulous research to make sure his work had authentic Hawaiian qualities, studying with Kenneth Emory at the Bishop Museum. He crafted the tapa beater print above the organ in the chapel at the Kamehameha Schools. His son, Philip L., said he most remembers his father's models of Hawaiian canoes. These models were up to 21/2 feet in length, he said. "They were scaled down models, double-hull canoes and racing and what not -- sailing canoes. He copied everything he could from the books. He didn't make up his own," Hooton's son said. He worked with Hawaiian canoe artist Herb Kane in Kona to make scaled-down copies of canoes in Kane's paintings. Born in Washington, D.C., Hooton grew up in Bloomington, Ill., and studied at Illinois Wesleyan. An Army major in World War II, he was assigned to Hilo in 1943, never returning to the mainland to live. He stayed on the Big Island after his Army service, joining Kohala Sugar Co. in 1948. His wife, Barbara, from Hilo, preceded him in death in 1973. His community work included serving as Traffic Safety Council president for the Big Island. Also, he was active in the American Legion. Besides his son, he is survived by daughter Patricia Hanohano; brother Robert; and seven grandchildren. A memorial service takes place at 10 a.m. Saturday at Kalahikiola Congregational Church in North Kohala. Friends may call after 9 a.m. Following the memorial services, urn burial will take place in Waianaia Cemetery. The family requests casual attire and no flowers.
