Betty Muther Jacob - Victory over Nazi control left much of Europe in ruins. Peace in the 1940s was almost as cruel as war: chaos, hunger and disease bred despair and anger. Most Americans, tired of war, were preoccupied with rebuilding their own lives at home. But Betty Muther Jacob knew that food and medicine were the best ways to keep the peace, and she helped build the United Nations' relief agencies into saviors for millions of people. Jacob, 88, a charismatic and tenacious worker for peace and justice worldwide for almost seven decades, died Wednesday. She had fought brain cancer and a series of strokes for two years. She kept working into her 70s and 80s, helping found the University of Hawaii's Matsunaga Institute for Peace and nurturing democracy amid the ruins of the Soviet empire. "She was a uniquely remarkable person," says Ralph Summy, the peace institute's current director. "She was able to combine competence in achieving her objectives, with compassion. She had tremendous compassion for people." In the 1940s, Jacob was an executive at the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Agency, and then UNICEF, the children's fund. Ratko Pleic, then a Yugoslav member of the UNICEF executive board, credits her with saving the fledgling agency by persuading a reluctant U.S. government to give hundreds of millions of dollars. Archives indicate Jacob was the first person to suggest Dag Hammarskjold, then a relatively obscure Swedish diplomat, for the post of U.N. secretary-general, a job he held from 1953 to 1961. Jacob first proposed UNICEF's popular Halloween tradition of children collecting change. She said she came up with the idea after her own children squabbled over Halloween treats. Jacob lived and worked in Hawaii since 1970. She helped launch programs of conflict resolution in local schools, then raised $250,000 in Washington for a Hawaii-based program that teaches students in Russia and America about democracy. During the Cold War, her friendship with leaders and academics in capitalist, communist and nonaligned nations helped her organize groundbreaking research projects with her husband, the late Philip Jacob, a University of Hawaii political science professor. She was especially proud that this work helped foster global dialogue and understanding.

While living in the all-white Philadelphia suburb of Swarthmore during the 1950s, she helped build interracial housing projects despite death threats and a cross burned on her front lawn. Jacob was a Quaker and lived by their virtues of sharing, simplicity and pacifism. Daughter Sally Jacob remembers helping her mother pick beach plums each summer so she could make jelly for friends and acquaintances at Christmas. "Even when we had hardly any money, she had a personal handmade gift for friends," Sally Jacob says. "Also, she always had room at our table for people, often inviting those who were from other countries who did not have family to eat dinner with us." Jacob, born in 1910 in a Chicago suburb, believed that repeated tragedies early in life fostered her lifelong desire to end wars and suffering. Her mother died when she was 4, her stepmother died six years later, and uncles were badly injured while fighting on opposite sides during World War I. She is survived by daughter Sally, sons Kirk and Stephan, and five grandchildren. A service will be held Thursday at 4 p.m. on the UH-Manoa campus, Student Services Center, Room 412. In lieu of flowers, please send donations to the Matsunaga Institute for Peace. For more information about the service, call 956-3774.
