In addition to his surgical skills, Gebauer devised instruments and techniques to aid in his work. From the late 1950s to the mid-1960s, he focused his attention on cardiac surgery. On Dec. 2, 1959, Gebauer ran the heart-lung machine in Hawai'i's first open-heart surgery at the Queen's Hospital. The Hawaii Heart Association presented Gebauer with its distinguished achievement award in 1966 for his open-heart surgery work. He also was recognized for the development of a heat exchange unit that became an integral part of the heart-lung machine. Former Queen's pathologist Dr. Paul Tamura said Gebauer's concern was for the patient and not for himself. "He didn't care if they just gave him one dollar, that's how unselfish he was," Tamura said. Dr. Frederick C. Greenwood, 73, one of the most beloved, outspoken and respected University of Hawaii-Manoa research leaders, died early yesterday Aug 8, 2000 of liver cancer. He directed the Pacific Biomedical Research Center for 27 years, developing PBRC into an internationally recognized institution.

The center attracted an estimated $80 million for research and training over the years through his efforts, building on a state investment of about $25 million. Alan Teramura, UH senior vice president for research, said: "Fred was one of our most outstanding directors and researchers ... Through his leadership at PBRC, he 'spun off' both the medical school and the Cancer Research Center. "He was a brilliant individual with a very creative mind and one of the finest gentlemen on this campus," Teramura said. Despite failing health, Greenwood was in his office until the last week of July, said Marilyn Dunlap, his assistant. He announced July 13 that he was stepping down on Aug. 1. Dr. Martin Rayner, professor of medicine, became acting PBRC director. A former marathon runner, Greenwood survived two multiple bypass surgeries and "he fought this one (cancer) long and hard," Dunlap said. He was given one year to live after a tumor was removed in December, 1998, she said. "He was a tough old bird ... He lived beyond that." She said he died at home surrounded by his wife, Gillian Bryant-Greenwood, also an internationally recognized PBRC scientist, and children, Peter Bryant-Greenwood and Kate Greenwood. Greenwood was noted, among many attributes, for his organizational abilities. He gave his wife lists of things to do upon his death and people to e-mail. He also wrote his own obituary. Colleagues were surprised that it was purely factual, expecting it to reflect his keen sense of humor. "Almost everything else he's ever written has a touch of something," Rayner said. "Someone should interject that very blithe, brilliant spirit that lived inside of Fred," said Rosanne Harrigan, dean of the School of Nursing who headed the UH Council of Deans and Directors until July 1. "He was just a wonderful man," Rayner said, "loved essentially by all of us -- even the people he drove wild." Greenwood was born and educated in England. He left the Imperial Cancer Research Fund in London in 1968 to join the UH Department of Biochemistry and Biophysics. He received many awards in England and here for his endocrine research. Greenwood and Dr. Gillian Bryant established a research and teaching laboratory in Hawaii with federal funding before he became PBRC director in 1973. He sought federal support for the Cancer Research Center of Hawaii, which began in PBRC, and obtained federal funding for research training programs for minority undergraduate students. A Research Centers in Minority Institutions Program was established with a 1985 grant. State-of-the-art molecular and electron microscopy techniques became available to UH researchers through that program. It resulted in Hawaii's first AIDS research program, now a major retrovirology research lab and AIDS Clinical Trials Unit. PBRC started a Native Hawaiian Research Activity focusing on diabetes and cardiovascular disease, and molecular endocrinology and matrix pathobiology became areas of excellence. A clinical research center was funded as a joint program of PBRC, the Medical School and Kapiolani Medical Center for Women and Children. In 1984, the biomedical research center incorporated a Hawaiian Evolutionary Biology Program which developed into a Center for Conservation Research and Training. Harrigan said when she first met Greenwood, "I thought, 'My God, who is that pompous ass?' I came to love him ... This university would not have its research enterprise without him. "Fred was very outspoken and generally right on the mark," said C. Barry Raleigh, dean of the School of Ocean & Earth Science & Technology. "He had strong convictions and was absolutely unafraid to voice them, which was a very rare and prized quality among academics." A sign in Greenwood's office expressed his philosophy and personality: "PBRC: We will foster research by any means short of a prison sentence."

Grace Buscher Guslander, 89, who helped define the image of a Polynesian resort as the manager of the Coco Palms Hotel on Kauai, died at her Wailua home yesterday April 5, 2000. She combined fantasy, mystery, Polynesian culture and palm trees to create a world that tourists loved to visit, and thousands of hotel rooms around the Pacific succeeded based in part on that vision. "She was a grand lady and a truly legendary figure in the hospitality industry," said Kauai Mayor Maryanne Kusaka. By 1965, 12 years after taking over her first and only resort property, her fame as a hotelier was global. She was named Outstanding Hotel Manager of the Year from among an international selection. She was named "Man of the Year" at New York City's International Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Show in 1979, the first woman to win the title. Two of the hotel managers she trained, who remained close friends, were at her side when she died. "Visitors were looking for magic, and when they came here, they found what they truly thought Hawaii should be. They found it at Coco Palms," said author David Penhallow, who left the hotel to manage the Hanalei Plantation Hotel, and later served as administrative assistant to Kauai Mayor Tony Kunimura and as an educator. "She defined Hawaiian hospitality as the industry knows it today. She set the standard," said Lopaka Mansfield, a former assistant manager under Guslander who now runs Waimea Plantation Cottages. She came to the hotel industry along a circuitous route from her Collegeville, Pa., home. She worked as an astrologer's assistant in Atlantic City, as a claims clerk in the Judge Advocate's Office at Fort Shafter, and as credit manager for a gourmet shop in Waikiki. She wrote a wine and food column for The Advertiser starting in 1952, and caught the eye of Moana Hotel Manager Lyle Guslander. Guslander in 1953 leased the Coco Palms property, on ancient royal fishponds under the shade of palm trees that had been part of an old copra plantation. He asked the then Grace Buscher to run it for him. She took the 24-room inn and began molding it into her vision of what Hawaiian tourism should offer. There were the giant clam shells imported from the South Pacific to serve as bathroom sinks. And the monkeys in the zoo set back in the palms. Artifacts from across the Pacific adorned the place. She invented the torch-lighting ceremony, turning a nightly maintenance chore into an evening spectacular, with muscular young men jogging along the hotel paths spinning torches as they set the night on fire. Outrigger canoes were pulled up on shore, and set off across the shallow lagoons for special events. The wedding of Elvis Presley in the movie, "Blue Hawaii," was performed aboard a double canoe in the Coco Palms lagoon. The thatched hut in which Elvis stayed during the filming is now considered a historic landmark. Weddings became big business at the Coco Palms, often in the chapel that Guslander converted from a movie-set chapel for Rita Heyworth's 1953 film, "Miss Sadie Thompson." Even though the hotel was closed after 1992's Hurricane Iniki, veteran Coco Palms entertainer Larry Rivera still oversees weddings on the grounds. Grace was famous for producing legends to fit any occasion. When newly introduced frogs kept people awake at night, she called for a legend, and the croaks became a natural part of the mysterious Hawaiian night. She also was known for the golf cart she drove all over her resort property, and for a family relationship with her staff that endured well beyond her retirement from the hotel. When Lyle Guslander sold the hotel chain in 1969, the two married. But Grace worked until 1985, continually upgrading the visitor experience she pretty much invented.
